“Connor, who plays Taylor Blaine, is phenomenal.”

“Connor Jessup is blowing me away. He is just magnificent,” says the Emmy winner. “If I’m singling someone out, it would be Connor — the subtleties, these small little moments of turmoil and rage that he lets out as Taylor; they are perfect for a young man who could possibly be going through what Taylor is going through... Connor does such an amazing job, with these little subtle moments of fear and rage that comes through.”

-Regina King, “Terri LaCroix,” 1/27/16

“I love Connor. As you said, he’s a good, young actor. I knew him the first time we were just sitting down with John, just sort of loosely reading over things. His emotion is right there. He kind of has that Leonardo DiCaprio, River Phoenix kind of emotion just right there. Very accessible, very honest, genuine and he’s very intelligent. That coupled with really great access to feeling and we both knew how lucky we were to be with each other.”

-Lili Taylor, “Anne Blaine,” 1/6/16

IndieWire

“In particular, the astonishing Jessup captures the silencing of rape survivors by individuals and institutions with greater social or political capital, constantly catching the sound of Taylor's voice before it can escape his throat. “

-Matt Brennan, 1/5/16

TV Insider

“As before, incendiary issues of class and race factor into this disturbing story, further inflamed by a sexualized social-media culture. The victim: Taylor (a fine Connor Jessup), a working-class teenage boy and scholarship student whose “white trash” hazing at an Indianapolis prep-school basketball team's party may have involved sexual assault.”
